Not illustrated. 1851 Excerpt: ...I very slowly delivered, the pains assisting. There was no laceration whatever. The patient remained unconscious, till the child, a full-sized male, was being carried from the room, when its cries seemed to awaken her. On our retiring from the bed-room she fell into a sound sleep, in which we found her, on going to say good night, about an hour afterwards. The following day I learned she had slept through the night, also that she had passed water freely. Everything went on propitiously. On the seventh day, the patient said, in reply to my inquiry, I have neither soreness nor swelling, and am perfectly comfortable. The chloroform here, unquestionably, produced remarkable relaxation of the perinacum and vagina, whereby, when the head was drawn by the forceps through the os externum, the resistance was considerably less, I am disposed to think, than it would have been but for this agent; and this is the more probable, if we bear in mind, that the head had not begun to dilate the external orifice, that the patient was muscular, and the perinacum unusually thick and strong. Moreover, I could only account for the absence of soreness, and, in great measure, of swelling of the vulva, to the relaxing influence of the chloroform. The tranquil state of the nervous system following labour, and the sound natural sleep, were worthy of notice, especially as the patient was of a sensitive and somewhat excitable temperament. With the aid of the same professional friend, I have lately delivered, by means of the forceps, two other patients, in their first labours, both under the full influence of chloroform; and the effects were in every respect as benign, the consequences to the mothers and infants as favorable, as in the present instance. I possess n...
